
Transform a Child’s Future as a School-based Speech-Language Pathologist
Few Careers Offer So Much Flexibility, Stability and Opportunity

THE NEED IS HUGE, AND THE REWARDS ARE EXCELLENT

Children with communication disorders can face huge challenges academically and socially. Speech-language pathologists (SLPs) work with a wide variety of students in schools to improve their communication skills and the results can be life-changing!

SCHOOL-BASED SLPs ARE IN HIGH DEMAND

Demand for SLPs is projected to grow 27% through 2028, faster than the average for all occupations.* Even during economic downturns, certified SLPs experience steady employment and are consistently in high demand.

As a result, you’ll enjoy excellent job security and superb benefits:

- Competitive pay. Salaries are higher with advanced degrees. Salary supplements, sign-on bonuses, tuition reimbursement, and paid relocation may be available.
- Flexible schedules. Work full-time or part-time; try job sharing; and enjoy school breaks and summers off. There are also opportunities to work in the summer for additional pay!
- Endless options. Work with students from preschool to high school; live in urban or rural settings; work one-on-one, in a classroom or virtually; develop a specialty or become an administrator — few professions offer so many opportunities.

What Credentials Do You Need?

Most states require a master’s degree from a CAA-accredited program, and some require an ASHA Certificate of Clinical Competence (CCC). The CCC requires:

- A master’s degree in communication disorders from an accredited program
- Complete a Clinical Fellowship
- A passing score on a national exam

“The thing that excites me most about what I’ll be doing post-graduation is being able to attend graduate school and being around other like-minded professionals who share the same interests as I do. Our field is so broad. I’m looking forward to kind of finding my place in speech-language pathology.”
